

MARKETING BREAKDOWN #002 · TUESDAY

Zomato. A food app that became a media brand.

Series · Marketing Breakdown (Tue) Date · 28 Jul 2026 Subject · Zomato

Framework · Your product is a media channel

Zomato isn't selling you food. It's selling a personality you follow.

You've screenshotted a food-app notification. You laughed at it. You sent it to a friend. That's not luck. That's the whole strategy.

Here's the move most brands miss. Zomato took its most boring surfaces and turned them into content. The push notification stopped being "your order is on the way" and became a joke you screenshot. The app copy got a voice. The social replies became memes remixed with a food twist.

Why it works: a notification is a channel you already own. It's free, daily, and opt-in. Most brands waste it. Zomato made it a punchline you share.

And it sells. During peak hours, those witty notifications drove roughly 10% more orders on their own. The joke isn't a distraction from the business. It is the business.

The principle: the best marketing isn't a campaign. It's making every touchpoint worth sharing.

The framework: your product is your biggest media channel. Every surface you own, notifications, packaging, receipts, replies, is free distribution.

💬 What surface are you wasting?

REEL · REVERSAL HOOK

Everyone thinks Zomato is a food-delivery app. It's a media company that happens to deliver food.

It turned its own notifications into jokes you screenshot, its app copy into a voice, its tweets into memes. Free channels most brands waste.

Those witty notifications alone drove about 10% more orders at peak.

The lesson: your product is your biggest media channel. Make every surface worth sharing.
