How does a startup with barely a product raise $15 million?

Vorflux just did. And the answer is the most important lesson in early-stage investing.

Vorflux is building an AI autopilot for software engineering. It turns a ticket into a finished, mergeable pull request: it plans the work, spins up sub-agents, writes the code, runs the tests, and reviews itself.

The product is early. There's no revenue. So why did Y Combinator and Peak XV, plus angels like Parker Conrad and Balaji Srinivasan, write a $15 million seed cheque, the size of a Series A?

Because at seed, there are no metrics to buy. You're not funding a product. You're funding two things.

One: the founder. Prasanna Sankar co-founded Rippling and ran its engineering, building it into a $13 billion company. Investors have watched him build before.

Two: the wave. AI coding agents are the hottest category in software right now. A proven builder, pointed at a rising market, before it gets crowded.

Here's the part most people miss. His last startup, a Web3 venture, shut down. Investors backed him anyway. A proven builder in a hot category outweighs one miss.

That's the seed signal: track record plus timing. When you have no numbers, those are the only two things worth betting on.

💬 What's your unfair signal, the thing an investor would bet on before you have metrics?

❤️ Save this before your next raise.

Everyone thinks Vorflux raised $15 million for its product. It raised it for its founder.

The product is barely built. But Prasanna Sankar co-founded Rippling and built it into a $13 billion company, and he's now pointed at AI coding agents, the hottest category in software.

At seed there are no metrics. Investors buy two things: the founder's track record and the size of the wave.

1. Seed Signal, Vorflux. It had almost no product, and investors handed it $15 million. What did they see.
2. Snapshot: Vorflux, founder Prasanna Sankar, $15M seed led by Y Combinator and Peak XV, angels Parker Conrad and Balaji Srinivasan, building an AI autopilot for software engineering.
3. The anomaly: $15 million is a Series A cheque, written at the seed stage with no revenue and barely a demo. Most seed rounds are a fraction of this.
4. The signal: they didn't back the product, they backed the founder. Prasanna Sankar co-founded and ran engineering at Rippling, now a $13 billion company.
5. The other half: right person, right wave. AI coding agents are the hottest category in software, and a proven builder was pointed at it before it gets crowded.
6. The part people miss: his last startup, a Web3 venture, shut down. Investors wrote the cheque anyway, because a proven builder in a hot category outweighs one miss.
7. Decoded: at seed there are no metrics to buy, so investors buy the founder's track record and the size of the wave. Follow @statupsutra, Seed Signal on Wednesdays.
